LEHI W. JONES

Lehi Wilford Jones, who celebrated his 93rd birthday with his family on November 15, died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Ann J. Gardner, Friday afternoon. He was taken ill the day after his birthday celebration and was bedfast most of the time until his death.

Mr. Jones, known as one of the most persistent supporters of community development activities ever to reside in Cedar City, was closely associated with community betterment undertakings in Cedar City for more than seventy-five years.

He donated the site for the Iron County hospital, was a leader in the program to bring the railroad to Cedar City in 1923, was one of the founders of the Branch Normal school, now the Branch Agricultural college, and was an organizer of the first electric power company in Cedar City, serving as president and manager of the company until it was sold in 1919.

He was president of the Bank of Southern Utah at the time of his death, a position he had held for 15 years. He was named president of the bank, when he was 78 years of age, after the bank was reopened as the result of reorganization efforts of such community leaders as Mr. Jones.

In 1905 Mr. Jones was elected president of the first "Commercial Club" of Cedar City, now the Chamber of Commerce, in which he held honorary membership at the time of his death. He also served as chairman of the Iron county hospital board for many years. During his life he served as Mayor of Cedar City, as a member of the City Council as member of the Board of Iron County Commissioners, and in numerous other capacities.

Active in LDS church affairs he filled a mission to the Southern States, was a member of the ward bishopric for eighteen years, and helped with the construction of the Manti and St. George temples.

At the age of 16 he began delivering mail between Cedar City and the mining towns of Nevada, and continued at the job for six years, riding daily during that time. He discontinued his mail contract to enter the University of Deseret, and then entered the cattle business, with which he was actively associated for the remainder of his life. In the early days he was a partner
